Document control is very important throughout the rulemaking process. The OLS attorneys reviewing the rule, the JLCAR, the public, and other stakeholders all need to be able to understand the differences and follow the changes from one draft of the rule to the next. Annotations need to be clear and concise.

There may be instances when the changes between existing rules and an initial proposal are so extensive it is difficult to recognize the differences. In such cases an agency may wish to consider repealing the existing text and adopting new text under the same section number, similar to a “repeal and replace” in statute.
